My dear Sir

I have received your letter of this date. I shall be very glad to see you at any time at which it may entirely suit your other arrangements to bring the scrap book, or other estate book. But there is no extreme urgency.

If the Intelligencer is to be sent as freight or baggage, or by express, the sooner it comes the better. Mr. Buchanan called on Friday before leaving for Cape May to report what you had written to him. But I did not understand him, as I now do your letter, which is explicit.

I think it probable that a collection of pamphlets containing the speeches of the late President may have been handed by him to his biographer Mr. Horton, or have been scattered about, as may variously have occurred. I find the supply much scanter than I had expected; and of those which I have received, there are no duplicates that I have as yet found. Spare copies from which to cut extracts might be very useful. I do not want to bore you to answer these remarks. But I merely suggest that whatever you can lay hands on will be acceptable.

I find a newspaper copy of the address of 4 July 1815 to which Mr. B refers in his letter to G. W. Jones. There was, I surmise, in 1820, something else tinctured strongly with federalism. But I do not as yet find it. Whatever use, or non-use of such memorials may be proper, I ought to be fully posted.

Truly Yours
John Cadwalader
