

names of the past which are fast disappearing from the community—Wallace, Yundt, Kinzer and Rutt.

A POSSIBLE EXPLANATION

In recent years, descendants of German settlers of Lancaster county, Pa., and of Rowan and other counties, of North Carolina, have exchanged notes containing the statement that numerous Pennsylvanians moved from this section of the State to North Carolina, and to the valleys of Virginia; that they long retained their habits, customs and language, and that in some localities they still speak the same dialect as their fathers.

Salisbury, being the seat of Rowan county, North Carolina, it may be that the statement of the honest colored man was even more true than the early dwellers on Blue Ball run realized, when he said: "I came from Salisbury, across the mountains, far away." He may have been an inmate of one of these migratory families from Lancaster to the South and have learned of our county and absorbed much of its peculiarities of speech, through his association with his boyhood's companions and others, and thus have cultivated a longing to come to this vicinity to live. It is quite possible that Salisbury, North Carolina, "across the mountains, far away," was the early home of this mysterious stranger. Let those who are inclined to "dream dreams," work out their own solution of the problem, "Where did Black Jim pass his slave days?"
